February 2004 (2004-02-06) Running time115 minutesCountryUnited KingdomFranceItalyLanguageEnglishFrench15 million The Dreamers is a 2003 romantic drama film directed by Bernardo Bertolucci. The screenplay was written by Gilbert Adair, based on his own novel The Holy Innocents. The film, an international co-production of companies from France, Great Britain and Italy, tells the story of an American student in Paris who, after meeting a peculiar brother and a sister who are film enthusiasts, becomes entangled in an erotic triangle. It takes place against the backdrop of the Paris student riots of 1968. The film refers several times to different films of the classic and New wave cinemas and contains excerpts from films, which are often re-enacted by the actors in certain scenes. There are two versions: an uncut uncut and an R-rated version that is about three minutes shorter. Plot Matthew is an American exchange student who came to Paris to study French. While protesting in the Cinémathèque Française against the dismissal of Henri Langlois, he meets the free-spirited twins Théo and Isabelle. The three connect through a shared love of film. After dinner with their parents, Théo and Isabelle offer Matthew the opportunity to stay with them while their parents are on a trip. Matthew accepts when he considers her to be his first French friends. Matthew becomes suspicious of their relationship after seeing them sleeping naked together; he soon discovers that they accept nudity and sexuality liberally. After Théo loses in a trivia game, Isabelle condemns him to masturbate to a Marlene Dietrich poster in front of them. After Matthew loses in another game, he is seduced to take Isabelle's virginity. The two then become lovers. Matthew begins to accept Théo and Isabelle's sexuality and his time to live with them soon becomes idyllic. The three play a famous scene from gang-part, breaking the world record for running through the Louvre, and Matthew and Théo engage in playful arguments about Charlie Chaplin and Buster Keaton, Eric Clapton and Jimi Hendrix, as well as the theme of Maoism, in which Théo fervently believes. During this time, Matthew begins to pursue a relationship with Isabelle, separated from Théo. Matthew and Isabelle leave the house and go on a regular date that she has never experienced. Théo retaliates by inviting a companion to his room and annoying Isabelle. She distances herself from Théo and Matthew, only to find her side by side on Théo's bed when an argument between the two becomes erotic. Then she surprises with a makeshift fortress and they fall asleep in each other's arms. One morning, Théo and Isabelle's parents come home and find the trio naked in bed. They are terrified of what they find, but let them be after leaving a check leave. After leaving, Isabelle wakes up and discovers the cheque when she realizes that her parents have found her. Wordlessly, she attaches a hose to the gas outlet and lays down with Théo and Matthew and tries to commit suicide. After a few moments, however, they are awakened by a brick that is hurled through the window; You will discover hundreds of students rioting on the streets. All three are overjoyed and join the demonstrators. Later, Théo joins a small team of demonstrators who prepare Molotov cocktails. Matthew tries to stop Théo by kissing him and arguing against violence, but he is supported by both Théo and Isabelle shunned. As Matthew walks through the chaos, Théo takes Isabelle's hand and hurls a Molotov cocktail at a number of police officers. Police are inchargeating the crowd. Actor Michael Pitt as Matthew Eva Green as Isabelle Louis Garrel as Théo Anna Chancellor as mother Robin Renucci as Father Jean-Pierre Kalfon as Jean-Pierre Léaud as Florian Cadiou as Patrick Pierre Pierre as First buff Valentin Merlet as Second buff Lola Peploe as The Usherette Ingy Fillion as Théo's girlfriend Production The first draft of the screenplay was an adaptation of Gilbert Adair from his own novel The Holy Innocents. In the pre-production, Bertolucci made changes to it: he peppered the narrative with excerpts from the films he loves and dropped homosexual content – including scenes from the novel in which Matthew and Théo show sex – which he thought was simply too much. After the film's release, he said he was true to the spirit of the book, but not to the letter. Eva Green told the Guardian that her agent and parents asked her not to take on the role of Isabelle because she was concerned that the film - which shows full frontal nudity and graphic sex scenes - would make her career have the same fate as Maria Schneider. [2] When Green saw a rough clip of the film, she said she was quite shocked and had to look away during the sex scenes; Later, she told an interviewer that it was like I was wearing a costume while we were filming. It was like I had a different story in my head. So I became speechless. [2] Rating Fox Searchlight Pictures gave the uncut version a limited cinema release in the United States in 2004; it played in 116 theaters at its peak. [3] In the United States, the film was theatrically released with an NC-17 rating[3], while in Italy the same film was rated VM14. Even with its NC-17 rating, this film earned 2.5 million US dollars in its US theatrical release – a respectable result for a specialized film with a targeted audience. [3] Reception On review aggregator Rotten Tomatoes, the film has a positive score of 60% based on 161 reviews, with an average rating of 6.18/10. The consensus of the website is: Although lushly atmospheric, The Dreamers do not engage or provoke as much as it should. [4] The 40 reviews collected by Metacritic yielded an average score of 62/100, which puts the film in the generally favorable category of the website. [5] A.O. Scott of the New York Times said the film was disarmingly sweet and utterly enchanting, describing it as a fus[ing] sexual discovery with political turmoil through an intoxicating, careless romance that almost obscures the film's patient, skeptical intelligence. [6] The Times called it an intoxicating mix of Last Tango and Stealing Beauty, but one that combines the dirty voyeuristic elements of each film, not its relative strength. [7] Roger Ebert gave the film four stars, its highest rating, and described the film as poignant and extraordinarily beautiful. [8] Music and soundtrack The music consultants were Julien Civange and Charles Henri de Janice Ginsberg is a music consultant and Nick Laird-Clowes is a music consultant. The soundtrack was released in February 2004. Allmusic gave him three out of five and found that while his juxtapositions of French tradition and counterculture are sometimes confusing, dreamers are still a worthy task to capture the personal and political revolutions of film through music. [9] Third Stone from the Sun - Jimi Hendrix Hey Joe (cover) - Michael Pitt & The Twins of Evil Quatre Cents Coups (from the score of Les Quatre Cents Coups) – Jean Constantin New York Herald Tribune (by Breathless) – Martial Solal Love Me Please Love Me – Michel Polnareff – Steve Miller Band The Spy – The Doors Tous les garçons et les filles – Francoise Hardy Ferdinand (from Antoine Duhamel's score by Pierrot Le Fou) Dark Star Je Ne Regrette Rien – Edith Piaf Although the music of Janis Joplin and Big Brother none of the songs was recorded on the soundtrack. All the songs in the film were from the album Live at Winterland '68. Bob Dylan's song Queen Jane Approximately from the album Highway 61 Revisited is also used in the film, but is not included in the soundtrack. The Doors song Maggie M'Gill can be heard in the film, but is also not included in the soundtrack. Home Media The Dreamers was released on DVD in 2004. It includes a BBC film by David M. Thompson, Bertolucci Makes The Dreamers, narrated by Zoa Wanamaker, and a documentary Outside the Window: Events in France, May 1968 with contributions by Robin Blackburn, Adair and Bertolucci. Bertolucci says that 1968 was about cinema, politics, music, journalism, sex and philosophy, which dreamed together.
